WALTER SMITH.

An Englishman, a Frenchman and an Irishman were discussing the merits of their respective countries. The Englishman said that if his lot had not been cast with England he would prefer to have been a Frenchman: the Frenchman feeling somewhat flattered, said: 'If I were not a Frenchman I would rather be an Englishman,' whereupon they asked the Irishman what he would be. Says Pat: 'If I were not an Irishman I would be ashamed.' Which is the way we should all look at our being Mississippians.

A bill collector says she cannot help but wonder what some people do with their money. She says she knows of two families whose homes adjoin. The men work for the same concern get the same wages and the families are about the same size. Both men have good habits. In one family the house is prettily furnished and the money is always ready for the monthly bills. In the other household the house is poorly furnished and the bill collector is put off from one month to another. It is not capital that counts; it's "managing."

The maples are flecked here and there with gold where the autumn sunlight gleams; there are silver threads in the meadows old where flow the purling streams; there are ruby glints in the Western sky, when 6 is told by the clocks, and quarries ledges far and high are 'there with the solid rocks.' There are topaz tints on the fading hills, and night is a sapphire rim. The birds carry bills in their flight from the climate grim. Why, the weeds, condemned as a sort of guilt, are in fact, the long, 'long green.' Wealth, pure and spotless, on every hand is strewn by nature rash, but we have to keep humping to beat the band to corral the tainted cash.

Mr. John Jolly died Sunday night at his home near Jolly. He has always been a good citizen of this county, popular among his neighbors and everyone in this city. He was buried here Tuesday.

Sam Higgins, who came here from Illinois to work at the Alert Handle Factory, disappeared about two weeks ago with a fine team and wagon belonging to Messrs. Clark. He was finally located at Shawneetown, Ill., where he is now being held until rights of the property can be tried, he having claimed, seemingly without foundation, the outfit.

Two men decided to go fishing. They spent one whole day fixing up a boat and tent and tackle. That evening they hauled the outfit several miles to a little lake. They pitched the tent, got supper, fed their team, launched the boat and got everything in readiness for an early morning fish. In the morning about daylight they grabbed their tackle and rods and the only quart of whisky left and made for the boat. While one of the men was rowing the boat the other was pattering around trying to get his tackle in shape. Accidentally he kicked the bottle of whisky and broke it. Every drop was spilled. The one who was rowing grew white with rage. He looked daggers at the other fellow. The one who spilled the whisky felt crushed. There was a long silence. Finally the man at the oars said: "Oh, hell! Let's go home." And they pulled for the shore, gathered up their tent, boat and other truck and went home without having made a single cast for a bass.

It is a fact that the fellows in this world who turn the other cheek and allow their enemies to smite it also are not cutting much ice. The great common herd of people refers to them as "rabbits." The world likes a scrapper. We don't mean by that a man who is always looking for trouble and who goes out of his way to hunt a fight. But a fellow who stands up for his rights, who is fair and decent in all things, but who will fight at the drop of the hat when some one tries to run over him. So now when a man puts the knife into us we just run along and remember it. Some day the opportunity comes to us to strike back, and we always do it. The opportunity always comes. There is nothing so sure as the law of compensation. The pendulum may swing pretty far north at times, but it sure to go just as far south a little later.
